Activities, Handouts and Lesson Plans

Use this Google ad on the most translated words on Google Translate as a discussion starter with your intermediate students or above. Talk about which words they most often translate and why. With advanced students, analyze some translations that Google Translate produces for accuracy of form and meaning. And with your academic students, have them read this interview with a Google Translate executive on the translation challenges their Artificial Intelligence team is currently tackling.

Use this video on Technology Addiction as a conversation starter with your intermediate students on how much smart phone use is too much. For additional resources on the safe use of technology and on digital citizenship search the resources from Commonsense.org. While the resources are designed for K-12 students, many of them can be adapted for adult language learners.

For a fun, non-language activity for your literacy and beginner students, have them create a selfie-portrait. Use the cell phone and tablet templates available from Teaching Ideas.

Discuss the cultural aspects of facial expressions with your intermediate and advanced students using the TED Ed lesson Are there Universal Expressions of Emotion?

Websites, Videos and Articles

Hippo Ed Tech, the developers of the Hippo Vocabulary App, is offering a free two-week trial of the app for all users. The app allows your students to create a personalized vocabulary database, based on texts that they are currently reading. The app is suitable for learners of all language proficiency levels.

Richard Byrne has made his Practical Ed Tech Handbook free to download on his Practical Ed Tech site. It is a great resource on the best technologies to use in the classroom and how to use them.

The British Council has a rich catalogue of teacher development publications that focus on both practice and theory, based upon action research from English language professionals around the world. Explore the Teacher Development Catalogue and the Professional Development Catalogue.

For ideas on how to use literature in your language teaching classroom read the Winter 2018 issue of Literature in Language Teaching.

For some good tips on classroom management, read the blog How to Have a Calm, Controlled, Effective Classroom Environment. While the tips are for K-12 classes, most of them also work in an adult classroom.

Are you in the northern hemisphere and thus in the throws of winter? If yes, try these Tricks for Surviving the Mid-Winter Teaching Blues to re-energize your teaching.

Professional Development Webinars, Journal Issues and Conferences

Oxford University Press has three free webinars in February:

- The Role of the First Language in English as a Medium of Instruction (EMI) on February 12th.
- How English is Changing on February 22nd and February 26th.
- Helping Students Build Core Vocabulary on February 26th

Catch two free webinars from Delta publishers--on February 10th, Going Mobile: Teaching and Learning with Mobile Devices and on February 24th, Engaging Busy People.

The Teacher Development Special Interest Group is holding a Web Carnival all of February, with live events on February 23rd.

Read the TESL Canada Journal Special Issue on professional development, entitled The Shifting Landscape of Professional Self-Development for ELT Practitioners.

For those of you interested in the use of technology for language learning, read the article Mobile Augmented Reality Learning Objects in Higher Education by Faith Marcel of Niagara College and the University of Toronto.

Mark your calendar with the International Conference on Task-Based Language Teaching, August 19th to 21st, Ottawa, Ontario, Canada. Abstracts for presenters are still being accepted.

Triaging Your "To Do" List

If you are anything like me, you have a lengthy "To Do" list. I live by my "To Do" List. It keeps me focused on what I need to get through in a given day. On a good day, my list gets down to a page. When things get really bad, my list goes up to two pages long. On those bad days, it is hard to even find items on the list as I work through them and want to cross them off. Keeping a "To Do" list manageable is crucial to being organized and efficient with your time.

The article "**Ask Four Questions to Ruthlessly Prioritize Your 'To Do' List**" has some simple suggestions for keeping your "To Do" list a manageable length.

1. Decide if the task is even worth doing. At the beginning of each week I review my list and eliminate items that are no longer relevant.
2. Look for ways to automate tasks. It may take some time to automate some of your repetitive, routine tasks, but that time is well-spent once the automation kicks in.
3. Identify tasks you can delegate. Sometimes it is better to pay someone to free up some of your time, so that you can then be more productive on tasks that have a significant impact on your school.
4. Put tasks off until later. I have a system of identifying urgent tasks that I need to do right away, and those that are important but not urgent. I review the degree of urgency at the beginning of each week and shift tasks around if necessary.

The ACE PD Exchange Video of the Month

This month's new video is: **Teaching Critical Reading Skills**.

Higher level language students, particularly those looking to move into higher education studies at an English-speaking university or college, need to learn to read critically, evaluating the quality of the content that they are reading. Reading critically means not just understanding the words on the page but also being able to 'read between the lines' for other layers of meaning presented by the author. In this video, we look at some of the most important critical reading skills that our students need to learn, including: using context clues; identifying and differentiating among inference, fact and opinion; identifying the main idea; pronoun referencing; and identifying the author's purpose.

Check out a sneak peek of the video or click here to access the full video and accompanying handout if you're already a member of the ACE Professional Development Exchange.
