	The course gives students an overall perspective on front-line research topics in materials science on the nanometer scale, as well as an in-depth insight into one of these topics which is chosen for the student report. This interdisciplinary course introduces the student to the theoretical basis, synthetic processes and experimental techniques for nanomaterials. The second purpose of this course is to give the students engineering perspectives of Physics and Nanotechnology. This is obtained through a number of lectures, each containing theory, and a technological/engineering aspect of a subject within physics and nanotechnology.

This course will examine some of the major concepts and theories that explain how and why sport is consumed. This will involve an examination of psychological and sociological approaches to consumer behaviour, and cover topics including identity, loyalty, subcultures, constraints, family influences, and gendered behaviour. The effective application of these ideas will be discussed within both nonprofit and for profit sport.

The study of Sport Development examines the creation and management of sports systems designed to optimize participation in sport from both an elite and recreational perspective. The design and management of sport programs has implications for the development of elite athletes as well as continual involvement in sport from a recreational perspective. This course takes a multidisciplinary approach in examining the issues involved with the development of effective sport systems.

Policy & Practice in Sport Development Policy and Practice in Sport Development involves the critical examination of sport systems that are designed to optimize participation in sport. Sport participation is concerned with the movement of athletes and individuals both vertically and horizontally through the sport system. Elite sport and recreational sport are therefore analyzed from both a policy and practical perspective. Moreover, the course examines the ways in which sport systems are created and managed to achieve program goals and to act as vehicles for social change.
